Read, Read, Read

A foreword by Mary Pope Osborne

Children often ask me: When you were a child, did you plan to become an author? I always answer no, because I never even thought about being an author when I was growing up. But I always knew one thing about myself: I loved living in my imagination. As children growing up on Army posts, my brothers, sister, and I spent much of our free time reveling in imaginative play. From pretending that we were performers in the circus to turning our green picnic table into a ship to believing we were living on a horse ranch—we slipped in and out of magical realms that seemed more real than our real lives. In fact, to this day the magic of the imagination has left me with the hazy impression that my brothers and I actually sailed the seas on a green ship my seventh summer, and that my sister and I performed a tumbling act for thousands. When we weren't playing games of pretend, the children in our family were often curled up somewhere reading. Wherever we lived, we made frequent bicycle visits to the local library to check out books. On the ride home, our wire baskets would be filled with Hardy Boys and Nancy Drew mysteries, the Little House on the Prairie books, and my brothers' beloved stories of Tarzan.

Reading perfectly complemented our imaginative play. A Little House on the Prairie book prompted us to lug giant cardboard boxes across the parade field near our house, pretending we were traveling west. A Tarzan tale sent us swinging from ropes in the woods. I'm certain that it was this combination of childhood reading and imaginative play that led to my becoming an author. It was so much fun I could never give it up.

Researchers in child development believe that imaginative play performs an important role in a child's acquiring a sense of self and independence. It helps children learn how to manage their emotions and overcome obstacles. But today most children no longer bicycle freely around their neighborhoods, climb trees, or play in the woods. Toys come with given names and complete personalities. Video games require no more than quick reflexes. DVDs, computers, and television programs devour a child's free hours.

For this reason, I believe reading plays a more important role in the lives of children today than ever before. Among all its other rewards, reading provides the last safe haven for a child's imagination to flourish. In The Gutenberg Elegies, Sven Birkerts writes about how he first fell in love with reading as a child. He beautifully extols the miracle of discovering how "a page covered with black markings could, with a slight mental exertion, be converted into an environment, an inward depth populated by characters and animated by diverse excitements." He goes on to tell how such pages of print awakened his inner life.

I have a fantasy that one day a young adult will remember how he or she enjoyed Magic Tree House books as a child. But when they pick up one of the stories, they'll be surprised to discover how thin the book is, how simple the writing. The adult will realize that the rich, full adventures they remember were a product of their collaboration with me. Their own imagination and inner life filled out the text.

A mysterious alchemy all the child's own converts the black markings on a page into precious friends and takes him or her on journeys around the world. As a reader, a child can be an adventurer, an explorer—and most importantly, a creator. Read, read, read, that's what I always tell children. Reading is magic.

Mary Pope Osborne is an award-winning author of more than one hundred books for children and young adults, including the best-selling Magic Tree House book series. She has received several writing awards from organizations such as the International Reading Association/Children's Book Council, Parents' Magazine, and the School Library Journal, and several of her titles have appeared on best-books lists.

Introduction

What Kids Are Reading: The Book-Reading Habits of Students in American Schools is the first comprehensive report to provide detailed information about books school children are actually reading. While Amazon.com and other online booksellers boast lists of best sellers and a local librarian can advise on which books are in frequent circulation, neither can tell you if any of these books were ever opened, much less if they were read cover to cover. Renaissance Learning has unique insight into the books kids are reading, and we are pleased to share this information with you for the first time.

On the following pages you will find lists of the top 20 books read in 2007 by students in grades 1–12—overall, by gender, by U.S. region, and by reading achievement level.

How do we know?

At Renaissance Learning, we are in the unique position of having arguably the world’s largest single database of student book-reading behavior, captured via Renaissance Learning’s Accelerated Reader (AR) software. For 2007 alone, our database contains a sample of reading records for more than 3 million K–12 students in more than 9,800 schools nationwide who read more than 78 million books.

When I first came to Renaissance Learning, I was astonished to find that the AR database housed such a wealth of information on student reading practice. Having worked on the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), I know what a large database looks like, but what I found at Renaissance Learning was truly breathtaking.

Accelerated Reader and other Renaissance Learning reading programs are used in more than 63,000 U.S. schools. Students read books, and then take AR computer quizzes to check if they understand what they have read. AR offers these quizzes for more than 115,000 books—covering virtually every title in a school’s library. Accelerated Reader software keeps track of all aspects of student book reading—titles of the books read, quiz scores, number of words read, book readability levels—and provides reports for students, teachers, administrators, and parents. Immediate quiz results help teachers shape subsequent reading instruction and motivate students to continue reading.

Because many schools that use Accelerated Reader also use Renaissance Learning’s standardized, computer-adaptive test of general reading achievement, STAR Reading, we also know the reading achievement scores for more than 2 million of the students in the AR database—before and after they gain that valuable book reading practice.

Roy Truby is senior vice president of state and federal programs for Renaissance Learning. He most recently advised on NAEP and assessment issues as an ambassador for the National Center for Education Statistics and Westat to chief state school officers and large urban school district superintendents.

From 1989–2002, Truby was the executive director of the National Assessment Governing Board, which has policy direction over NAEP. Truby has held positions as state school superintendent for Idaho and West Virginia and served as district superintendent in Greenville County, South Carolina. He holds a doctorate in education from the University of Idaho and has taught students in junior high through graduate school.

Why do we care?

To Read or Not To Read: A Question of National Consequence,¹ the recently published omnibus report by the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) that documents the many negative effects of our nation's reading trends, has put reading—or rather the lack thereof—back in the national spotlight. Not since the National Institute of Education's 1985 publication, Becoming a Nation of Readers, has there been such a clarion call for increasing student time spent reading at school and at home.

The NEA report draws three conclusions:

1. Americans are spending less time reading.
2. Reading comprehension skills are eroding.
3. These declines have serious civic, social, cultural, and economic implications.

The NEA's findings, as well as those of NAEP and the Program for International Student Assessment (PISA), have been strikingly similar for more than a decade.

The NAEP 2000 (4th-grade) report stated, "As with the acquisition of many skills, practice is important to reading development....it is generally agreed that practice in reading develops better readers." The same report went on to say, "Students' reports in 2000 indicate a consistent relationship between the daily amount of reading done in school and for homework and reading performance."

Also in 2000, the international (PISA) study² reported that in examining the reading habits of 15-year-old students in 30 countries, "All students who are highly engaged in reading achieve reading scores that are significantly above the national mean, whatever their family background." The study concluded that, "Engagement in reading has the largest median correlation with achievement."

For nearly 13 years, I had the honor of serving as executive director of the National Assessment Governing Board for NAEP. During this time, I actually advised the Board to stop using student and teacher background questions on reading practice, wondering why we needed even more evidence explaining what we already knew. That may have been a mistake, as it is clear that still not everyone is convinced by the overwhelming evidence of the importance of reading practice—including some officials in the U.S. Department of Education who told Reading First educators to not dedicate time for independent book reading in school. Recently, an evaluation of the multibillion dollar Reading First program found that it did not impact students' reading comprehension scores.³ One wonders whether the program's approach to reading, in which little to no time was dedicated to student reading practice, contributed to its failure.

It is no wonder Dr. Linda Gambrell, president of the International Reading Association, has recently called for more time for independent reading during school. In an article in Reading Today,⁴ she cited recently published experimental research showing what common sense has already told us: "Practice helps students become better readers." Indeed, research has shown that to develop expertise in anything requires both instruction and many, many hours of practice.

It is encouraging to see that school leaders have recently been promoting reading practice. Initiatives such as Denver Public Schools' "Million Words Campaign" and Seattle Public Schools' "Read a Million Words, Seattle" promote book reading and set annual reading volume goals. And the state of California has suggested grade-level benchmarks for the amount of reading students should be doing.

Twenty-two years ago, at the kitchen table of her home in central Wisconsin, Judi Paul developed a quizzing system to help motivate her children to read. Little did she realize then that what would become Accelerated Reader would not only help thousands of teachers manage and motivate book reading, but also become an amazing research tool making it possible to produce reports like this one that would be so telling about the reading habits of more than 3 million American students.

Having worked for years with state and national leaders creating high-stakes tests, I have been surprised and pleased to see firsthand at Renaissance Learning that students enjoy taking AR tests. The right kind of test—one that is non-threatening and provides immediate feedback—can actually be motivating and inspire a love of reading in students.

I believe What Kids Are Reading provides an important contribution to the research on reading practice. Although we are concerned as many are that school children—and Americans, overall, for that matter—are not spending enough time developing the critical skill of reading, we offer this report as a step in the right direction.

Teachers and Parents: Please use the bonafide lists within to guide your students and children to a new book that may whet their reading appetites! I find it reassuring, as I'm sure you will, that students are still reading the classics I read as a child, and exciting that many new titles appear on these lists as well. However, in my opinion, notably missing are the historical novels and biographical works so integral to understanding our past and contemporary books that help us understand our world. Delve in and see what you discover.

And stay tuned. We plan to keep you informed of student book-reading trends in the years to come by providing periodic updates of this information.

Overview

What Kids Are Reading: The Book-Reading Habits of Students in American Schools answers the following questions about student reading behavior:

- What books do students in each grade read most often, overall and by gender?
- What books do students in each grade in each U.S. census region⁵ read most often?
- What books do students in the top 10% of reading achievement read most often?

The report draws on the only source available to determine the books students are truly reading—Renaissance Learning’s Accelerated Reader (AR) database. Unlike other booklists, publisher book-sale data, or individual library-circulation information, this database provides information about the books that students have read and how well they comprehended what they read.

Accelerated Reader Software

Renaissance Learning, Inc., developed the Accelerated Reader software to solve a problem with the management of book reading in schools. All reading curricula include recommendations that students read books both in and out of school. However, the traditional methods to account for and manage book reading, such as reading logs, reading journals, parent reports of their child’s reading, and oral and written book reports, are burdensome to teachers and often highly unreliable. Accelerated Reader was designed to make the job of managing book reading, often called reading practice, easier, less burdensome, and more reliable.⁶

Accelerated Reader is a progress-monitoring system. It helps teachers accurately and efficiently monitor student progress in the quantity and quality (comprehension) of their book reading. Introduced in 1986, Accelerated Reader has become one of the most popular educational software programs, used by an estimated 15 to 20 million students in the US. AR software is evaluated on the basis of reliability, validity, and usability, and has been positively reviewed by the National Center on Student Progress Monitoring. Reliability refers to the consistency of scores and validity is the degree to which the assessment measures what it claims to measure. Usability takes into account the value of the information that the assessments generate versus the time and money spent to obtain the information.

While AR has become increasingly sophisticated over the years, its basic three-step approach has not changed: First, a student reads a book either at school or at home. Next, the student takes a computerized quiz of 5, 10, or 20 items depending on the length of the book. Then, the student and teacher receive immediate feedback and reports detailing books read, number of words read, book reading level, and comprehension (percent correct on the quiz).

There are currently quizzes on more than 115,000 books, so students can read and quiz on just about any book available in a school or public library. AR also includes quizzes to assess vocabulary and literacy skills, as well as quizzes on leading reading textbooks and content-area leveled readers.

Accelerated Reader Best Classroom Practices

Accelerated Reader is used by millions of teachers throughout the US because it saves teachers time, motivates students to read more, and is more reliable and accurate than traditional methods of tracking student book reading. Accelerated Reader best classroom practices are a set of research-based implementation recommendations that are used if educators want to take AR a step beyond merely replacing traditional tracking systems. Best practices include methods to accelerate reading achievement and require changes in teacher, classroom, and even school practices, such as allocating more time for in-school reading, and establishing individualized goal setting and careful monitoring of student reading comprehension.

Renaissance Learning strongly recommends implementing AR using best classroom practices to ensure students benefit from reading practice to the greatest extent possible. Extensive research has shown it is not just the quantity of reading or time spent reading that helps students read well and become well read, but also the quality, or how carefully—at what comprehension level—they read. The more carefully students read the more they comprehend and the more their practice leads to improved reading achievement.

Approximately 50,000 teachers nationwide have chosen to adopt the AR best practices program, and many of them have subsequently achieved model or master implementer certification.⁷ Students in classrooms where teachers have implemented best practices find their students read more books and improve their reading achievement at a faster rate. The research base on AR best practices has been favorably reviewed by groups such as the Florida Center for Reading Research and the What Works Clearinghouse. And to date, dozens of research studies and independent reviews have been published on AR,⁸ with at least 16 articles appearing in peer-reviewed journals.

The Accelerated Reader Hosted Database

Five years ago, a web-based version of Accelerated Reader was introduced with the option for schools to have Renaissance Learning host their AR program at the Renaissance data center in Wisconsin Rapids, Wisconsin. Hosting is often seen as an attractive alternative to having AR software run on school servers because of cost savings and the additional security and data protection provided by Renaissance Learning. For 2007, the Renaissance hosted database contained the AR book-reading records for more than 3 million K–12 students in more than 9,800 schools nationwide who read more than 78 million books.

Each student reading record includes, among other things, the title of each book on which the student took a quiz, the percent correct achieved on each quiz, the number of words in each book quizzed on, and the readability level of each book based on the ATOS readability formula. Schools may optionally record demographic information about students such as gender, free-lunch status, ethnicity, and other attributes.

Renaissance Learning also has developed a computer-adaptive reading test called STAR Reading,⁹ which has become the most widely used reading assessment in U.S. schools. STAR Reading can be administered up to 10 times per year, and reports a wide variety of scores, including National Percentile Rank and Grade Equivalent, that help teachers monitor student progress in reading achievement. If students using AR have been tested using STAR Reading, this information is also stored in the student record.

The Data for What Kids Are Reading

The source of the data used to answer the questions in Sections 1 and 2 of this report is a database consisting of Accelerated Reader data collected from January to December 2007. The database includes 3 million students in grades 1–12¹⁰ who read more than 78 million books and then took an AR quiz on each book (see Table 1). The students came from 9,898 schools, a group covering all 50 U.S. states and the District of Columbia. Although 2007 spans halves of two school years (spring 2007 and fall 2007), care was taken in reporting the number of students to ensure that no students were double counted.

⁷ Renaissance Certification is a professional recognition program for educators implementing Renaissance Learning’s research-based best practices.

¹⁰ Some schools also use AR in kindergarten, but we have limited this report to grades 1–12.

Book reading data by gender is reported in Section 1. It should be noted that gender data was unavailable for approximately 40% of students. Thus, in that section the Overall category compiles student records for boys, girls, and unknown gender, whereas when information is reported for the boy and girl categories individually, records for students of unknown gender were excluded.

The data used to answer the question in Section 3 of this report originate from a database that includes Accelerated Reader and STAR Reading scores from the 2006–07 school year. Relative to the database used to answer the questions in Sections 1 and 2, this database is smaller because fewer schools were hosted by Renaissance Learning in 2006–07, and the data presented take into account student reading-achievement scores on STAR Reading from spring 2007; therefore, only students with scores from that period are included. As noted in Table 2, the 2006–07 database includes 2.1 million students in grades 1–12 from 7,658 schools. Section 3 investigates which books students in the top 10% of reading achievement read, further reducing the number of students to about 90,000.

Please note: Renaissance Learning recognizes, of course, that not all book reading that happens in or outside of the classroom is captured through the Accelerated Reader software. However, it is reasonable to assume that for users of Accelerated Reader much book reading is captured in this way. AR quizzes number more than 115,000, which allows students a wide range of book selection; nearly every book found in a school, classroom, or local library has a quiz available.

Also, the sample of data from the AR database, upon which this report is written, is a sample of convenience rather than truly representative of U.S. schools, so care should be taken when interpreting the results. However, what cannot be disputed is that with records for more than 3 million students at more than 9,800 American schools, this sample is significant. What’s more, the AR database is one of a kind. We are unaware of any other database that has captured student reading behavior on this scale.

The ATOS Book Readability Level

As mentioned earlier, Accelerated Reader uses the ATOS readability formula to measure the text difficulty of each book for which a quiz is available. The ATOS readability level, available in an easy-to-understand grade-level score, helps students, teachers, and parents with the book selection process. Using ATOS, students can find books to read within their reading achievement range—books that are neither too easy nor too hard that will challenge them without causing frustration or loss of motivation.

Renaissance Learning and Touchstone Applied Science Associates jointly developed the ATOS readability formula. ATOS uses four factors to measure a book’s readability score: average sentence length, average word length in number of letters, word difficulty level, and total number of words in the book.¹¹ To calculate a book’s ATOS score the entire book is scanned into a computer so the readability level is based on the entire book rather than a 100-word sample sometimes used to measure readability by makers of other formulas.

ATOS has proven to be a reliable and valid measure of book difficulty. An interesting way to provide a frame of reference for ATOS is to show scores for a selection of popular publications. We selected a sample of four popular newspapers: The New York Times, The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, and USA Today. From each paper, we selected the five most recent issues. And from each issue, we applied the ATOS formula to the full text of all stories that began on page one. In addition, we selected three feature stories from each of three recent issues of People. A total of 113 articles were scanned. The average ATOS scores are presented in Table 3.

Table 3. Average ATOS Readability Levels of Articles From Five Popular Publications

Publication	Number of Articles Scanned	ATOS Readability Level
		Average	Minimum	Maximum
The New York Times	32	7.8	6.3	9.7
The Washington Post	30	7.8	5.7	9.3
Los Angeles Times	28	7.3	4.9	8.6
USA Today	14	6.6	5.1	8.6
People	9	5.4	4.0	6.1

Reading Practice Is Essential

Guided independent reading is at the heart of Accelerated Reader. To improve student reading achievement, it has been shown that initially students need to comprehend more than 85% of what they read independently, and after about the fourth grade, students need to comprehend more than 90%.¹² Students can read a very broad range of books to accomplish this, especially after achieving about a fourth-grade reading level. In fact, for older students and better readers, it is more important to read a lot of books at a high comprehension level than to read at the maximum readability level. The lists of frequently read books in this report reflect this pattern, with students in the middle and upper grades reading books representing an increasingly wider range of readability levels.¹³

We hope the publication of What Kids Are Reading: The Book-Reading Habits of Students in American Schools will help to promote more high-quality book reading in schools. Reading is a skill that must be practiced, and reading books is the best way to practice this skill. Like any other skill, we cannot expect to see improvements in reading without the essential ingredient of high-quality practice.

As Vince Lombardi was reported to have said, “It’s not practice that makes perfect, it’s perfect practice that makes perfect.”

Reflections on Reading

by S.E. Hinton

There are a lot of good writers out there, so it is always flattering to get a letter from a kid who says, “I read all the time and your books are the best.” But nothing compares to one who says, “I never read a book in my life until I read your book. And now I like to read.” That is the most satisfying thing a writer can hear; that you’ve helped others to enjoy the biggest influence in your life—reading.

It’s been said that if you don’t read you’re not any better off than if you can’t read. That doesn’t begin to cover it. Reading is the closest thing we’ll have to a mind-meld until we discover the planet Vulcan. There will never be a computer as interactive as a book.

With a book, you can enter a mind that existed a thousand years ago. Use someone’s imagination to bungee-jump a thousand years into the future. Experience more lifetimes than the most intrepid adventurer.

I know what it’s like to grow up in poverty in Brooklyn. I’ve been a bull-dancer in ancient Crete. I’ve experienced an entire life in fourteenth-century Norway. Rode on a cattle drive; grew up with Alexander the Great.

Learning not how to do something but how to feel something; recognizing self in the most foreign other. Reading has been one of the biggest influences in my life—not only in my profession, but my thoughts, actions, values. Knowing I’ve opened this door for others will always be my most rewarding accomplishment.

S.E. Hinton is best known for her novels The Outsiders; That Was Then, This Is Now; Rumble Fish, and Tex. In 1988, she became the first recipient of the Margaret E. Edwards Award from the School Library Journal for these contributions to young adult literature. She has also written two books for children, Big David, Little David and The Puppy Sister, as well as a novel, Hawkes Harbor, and collection of short stories, Some of Tim’s Stories, for adults.

Reflections on Reading

by Daniel Handler

As I write this, at my desk on a fairly ordinary working day, I have a number of books within reach. I have the book I'm reading. I have the other book I'm reading. I have two of my all-time favorite books, which I'm keeping as sort of touchstones to aid in the book I'm writing. I have another book it was suggested I read in another book I was reading. In a pile to one side I have seven books I have agreed to read in order to write about them, two books I have agreed to read for other reasons, two excerpts of books I have agreed to read for still other reasons, a book I wrote, and a publication devoted to books.

Behind me, within reach on a shelf, I have twenty volumes of a reference book and one other reference book I might need, and in a cupboard, also, I swear to you, well within reach, I have seven books I will read next, ten books I will read sometime, and one book I just like to have around. If I were to cheat, and move my chair, then within reach would be an untidy arrangement of—I just counted—eighteen additional books, huddled there because I'm still thinking about them with such frequency that it makes no sense to put them on a shelf.

You can see that I'm entirely unsuitable for contributing to an informed and sober study of what young people are reading, in the same way that Captain Ahab would be unsuitable to introduce an informed and sober study of marine life. I am obsessed. It has been this way since childhood. Reading has haunted and hypnotized me, provided escape when reality was uncooperative, and reality when escape was insufficient. It has nurtured me in ways no other thing could provide and it has showed me ways in which I need to be nurtured I would not have otherwise imagined. It has brought me close and swept me away, tickled my fancy and shattered my heart, tucked me into bed and kept me up all night, and showed me that the world, like all seventy-five books I have just mentioned, was within reach.

None of these results are immediately detectable. Reading is largely a private activity, and thus its effects are largely private. When you walk around you can't identify the readers straightaway, but eventually you can identify the readers, who tend to be thoughtful, which means they're often innovative, which means they're often successful, which means they're often happy, and a world of happy people is the whole point of walking around in the first place. It is often said that reading is a gift, but to my mind that is an insufficient description, for the size of the gift of reading is so vast that it is difficult to see what is outside its wrapping. I wish every child could have this gift, but every child is different and so the gift must be wrapped differently for each one.

This is exhausting to think about, but I am grateful to the people compiling this study for thinking about it, and for making it easier for all of us to wrap this gift properly. I hope you will read this report, and that you will keep it well within reach on your desk. Even if your desk is like mine, there should be room for it, if you move one of those other books just slightly to the left.

Daniel Handler is author of the Series of Unfortunate Events books, among other titles. His writing has garnered awards including the Quill Award for The Penultimate Peril, and the Academy of American Poets Prize.

Reflections on Reading

by Christopher Paul Curtis

Writers who do school visits learn very quickly that during the Q & A period after your speech you will be asked the same questions over and over. Aside from the queries on shoe size, income, and favorite color, one of the most common questions I get is, “What’s the coolest thing about being a writer?” I love this question because it allows me to explain the joy I feel when it comes to my profession. I revel in letting the youngsters know my official title is Holder of the Best Job in the World! I break this down to them by explaining how I’m pretty much my own boss, I set my own hours, I’m paid more than I’d ever dreamed I’d make, I get to travel all over the world, I meet hundreds of smart, interesting people, and I make a living doing something I love. While the youngsters sweetly feign being impressed by this list, I accidentally discovered an aspect of my job that really leaves them agog.

It was during an autographing session after one of my talks that I signed a book for a fifth grader and handed it back to him. He thanked me, pointed at my inscription and, with an overly dramatic look of bewilderment, asked his teacher, “What does that say?” His teacher smiled at me and quickly shooed the little brat on his way. (In the child’s defense I have to admit that one seller of rare books listed an advance reading copy of my first novel, The Watsons Go to Birmingham—1963, as “Slightly shelf-worn but otherwise in excellent condition; indecipherable scrawl on title page is allegedly author’s signature.) Yowch!

In light of that little interaction, the next time I was asked what was the coolest part of being a writer I gave the usual list and added, “Plus, I get to scribble my name in books in front of teachers and librarians. And I do it with ink. And they don’t slap me or complain; they just smile and pretend it doesn’t bother them. They even say thank you!” Now how cool is that?

Something else I’m frequently asked is, “Did you learn to write books in college?” This is another one of my favorite questions because it allows me to talk about two of the most important parts of my life: reading and the library. No, I didn’t learn to write while in college; in fact, I took only one writing class while a student at the University of Michigan-Flint.

I firmly believe I learned to write in the same magical way that many other authors did, by going down an old and mysterious path that remains open for your students to follow as well. What is this path? Under what staircase or down what rabbit hole or through what wardrobe can the beginning of this path be found? None of the above—the path instead begins at the library and is followed one book at a time. I tell students that I learned to be a writer by first becoming a reader. Reading is the natural parent of writing.

The magic of the library is that Christopher Paul Curtis or Jerry Spinelli or Ms. Johnson or little Ashley from Room C can go in, check out a book, and go home and commune with any number of the greatest writers in history. We can read these authors’ books in two different ways and with two different motives. We can pick up Monster by Walter Dean Myers, enjoy being caught up in the story, feel the suspense of the trial, and grow more and more involved with each turned page. But we can also analyze Mr. Myers’s craft and try to figure out what he does to make the story so emotional.

We can recognize and emulate his pacing, his set up, and his effort to produce tension. We can ask, “Now what did he do to make me feel the way I felt at this particular point? How did he make me cry here and laugh there?” And the great thing is that we can get these same lessons from authors as diverse as Toni Morrison and Mark Twain, Robert Cormier and Virginia Hamilton, and Patricia Reilly Giff and Jacqueline Woodson. All of this is available to us through the magic of books.

Another wonderful aspect of this whole reading/learning dichotomy is that often we aren't even conscious of the many levels of learning that are going on while we read. We soak up what the author is doing and, without completely understanding how, we can gain writing lessons from the simple act of reading.

This is why I love books so much; they are a tremendous gateway to a multitude of pleasures. And whether we gain entry to books in places as mysterious as under the staircase or through a rabbit hole or through a wardrobe, or in places as magical as the library, books all lead to the same wonderful destination: knowledge.

Christopher Paul Curtis is the award-winning author of The Watsons Go to Birmingham-1963 (Coretta Scott King Award, Newberry Honor); Bud, Not Buddy (Coretta Scott King Award, Newberry Medal); and Elijah of Buxton (Coretta Scott King Award, Newberry Honor), among other titles.

What Books Do Students in the Top 10% of Reading Achievement Read Most Often?

What books are read by the strongest readers in each grade? This section lists the top 20 books read during the 2006–07 school year by students that had a National Percentile Rank score between 90 and 99 on their final STAR Reading assessment. (Percentile Rank is a norm-referenced score that indicates the percentage of students in the same grade and at the same point in time in the school year who obtained scores lower than the score of a particular student. In other words, Percentile Ranks show how an individual student’s performance compares to that of his or her same-grade peers on the national level. The range of Percentile Ranks is 1 to 99.) It is interesting to see that these students read many of the same books that all students read (see Section 1) with the exception of a few different titles and some books that are at a higher readability level. This explains why, in nearly all cases, average book readability levels for these students are higher than those read by all students.
